Introduction

In our society, there are concepts such as "leader", "leader", "leader", "sardor". In fact, they all mean the same thing and serve the same purpose. Therefore, it is difficult to identify a significant difference between the concepts of a leader and a manager. Their duties, responsibilities, and characteristics are equal. However, one is considered official and the other is unofficial. A leader is formal, meaning he is appointed to this position by law. A leader is informal, meaning he is chosen by a group based on their wishes. These are two different forms of leadership. In many cases, a leader first gains a position and then respect from that position, while a leader gains a position through respect.

A person with a high position, a leader, achieves leadership on his own and tells his subordinates what to do. A true leader, in contrast, shows his followers what to do and participates in it himself.

A leader is at his or her greatest strength when his or her followers do not doubt his or her presence, power, or talents, but rather trust him or her. The qualities that set a leader apart from others serve to elevate him or her to greatness.

One of the main aspects that distinguishes a leader from others is the leader's confidence, first of all, in himself and in the followers who follow him. As our great scholars say, feeling your strength adds strength to your strength. A leader should always consult with those around him before starting any work and delegate some of the tasks assigned to him to them. This will prove that he has a high level of trust in his followers.

One of the most important characteristics of a leader is their optimistic thinking, that is, their ability to see only the positive aspects of each goal they set. They are also considered to have the ability to make the right decisions. While some people think long and hard and change their decisions several times, a leader makes a decision once and never doubts his decision. That is why leaders are said to have the ability to see the future. But they don't have that power. Leaders simply strive to create a future for themselves and sometimes make decisions that can change the world.

A leader knows his strengths and advantages well and strives to use them as effectively as possible. At the same time, he is also able to recognize his weaknesses and tries to correct them so that they do not remain weak.

Great people are those who help others feel that they can be great too.

“Mark Tven”

A leader must have the ability to influence those around them. This includes the ability to motivate others, guide them to the right path, help their colleagues discover and develop their talents, and be supportive.

In this era of ever-increasing development, we cannot help but recognize that the demand for leaders has increased. Examples of modern and common problems in leadership psychology include the inability to communicate, lack of a sense of responsibility and accountability, inability to reach agreements and compromises, inability to achieve satisfactory results in planned work, and the standard of incentives and punishments.

The ability to effectively and correctly use democratic and liberal principles is also a common problem in leadership. In most cases, a leader acts on the basis of liberal principles, that is, he informs his subordinates of all his plans and goals, consults with them, trusts them all equally and does not doubt any of them. This increases the respect of group members for the leader.

But there are situations where a leader is required to make decisions for his group and not rely on anyone.

A leader who operates on democratic principles, on the contrary, relies only on himself, does not trust anyone and does not consult. Decisions are made by the leader and everyone is required to obey them. This can lead to a loss of self-confidence among group members. However, sometimes it is beneficial to listen to others and exchange ideas with them.

It follows that a leader must be able to use both democratic and liberal principles wisely at the right time.

A leader must be able to overcome all shortcomings in order to achieve the goal he has set for himself, and at the same time, be able to build immunity against problems. Not avoiding problems and being able to resolve them in a short time by agreement are also strong points of an effective leader.

One of the main tools of a leader is his ability to establish communication. A leader must be a person with the power to ensure communication between his followers and between himself and them. Through communication, a leader should be able to inspire his group members and turn their “I” into “we.” Through this, he will be able to make his followers care about the group and unite them. The more harmonious, agreeable, and like-minded the group is, the faster and easier it can achieve its goals. And the role of communication in achieving goals is invaluable.

When we think about communication, we should not forget about politeness. When a leader solves any problem with politeness and gentleness, the love and respect of those around him increases.

In order for a leader to achieve the desired and expected results, he must first have a high sense of responsibility and accountability. A leader must not only be a responsible person for each of his colleagues, but also be able to fulfill the tasks assigned to him responsibly. He must have sufficient knowledge about his teammates and be very aware of each of their strengths, weaknesses, and talents. He must be able to support, assist, and encourage them in any situation. When a leader feels responsible for each task, every task is completed efficiently and on time.

A leader must also be able to ensure that the group members work together in a coordinated manner. He or she is required to be interested in the opinions of each member of the group and to be able to bring them together towards a common goal. After all, when everyone is working towards the same goal and working together, the difficulties they face on their way to achieving their goal are easily overcome.

The person leading the group must complete each task on time and in an orderly manner. One should strive to achieve the set goals one by one with patience. A person who tries to achieve everything will ultimately achieve nothing. With this in mind, I would advise you to work based on a plan.

As the leader and his followers reach their goals, the leader must not forget to encourage them. Through encouragement, he can inspire his followers and motivate them to strive forward. When it comes to incentives, leaders certainly don't shy away from punishment. But as with everything, it is useful for a leader to know the norm. Excessive use of punishment can lead to a decrease in the level of development. If a leader does not achieve the expected results and in such a situation prefers to punish rather than find the reason and solve it, he will accustom the group members to this. As a result, the concepts of moving forward and growth will disappear in the group.

Adaptability is one of the most important requirements for a leader today, and at the same time, it is one of the modern challenges of leadership. A leader must be able to adapt quickly and easily to any situation and circumstance. He must know how to behave in any environment and act in a way that is appropriate to the place and the conditions of that place. Adaptability, above all, also requires communication skills.

The importance of each aspect of a leader is that they are all inextricably linked; one cannot negate the other, but rather serves to complement each other. For example, only if he believes in himself can he trust his teammates. This inherent trust creates an optimistic spirit in them. Any person in a positive mood can make the right and well-thought-out decisions. The ability to feel responsibility and accountability leads a leader to great heights.

CONCLUSION

A modern leader must also have high intellectual potential, meaning he or she must have worldly knowledge, be familiar with computer technology, have proven themselves in every field, and have developed sufficient skills. I am confident that a person who is comprehensively developed, has achieved spiritual and physical perfection, and has leadership qualities can find his place in society.

Leaders are among the greatest people who care about the future of society. When they live their lives thinking, "If not me, then who?", we are sure that a bright future awaits us.
